FASTING UNTO DEATH ACCORDING TO THE JAINA TRADITION*

BY COLETTE CAILLAT
CNRS, ERA 904, University of Paris

Since about 1900 a number of thorough studies have been devoted to the various forms of suicide which are known to have taken place in India.¹ Recent contributions on the subject of

* This is the revised text of lectures given in 1972 at the Universities of Stockholm and Copenhagen. I thank these Institutions as well as Professor S. Liebhard, Professor H. Hendriksen, and Dr. I. Fisler for their kind invitation. My sincere thanks also go to Mr. K. R. Norman (University of Cambridge, U.K.) and to Dr. Eric Grinstead, who were kind enough to amend the English text, and to Mrs. Else Pauly and the Acta Orientalia, who made the necessary arrangements for the publication of the present essay.

Moreover, the Brahmanical facts have been collected and discussed by Kane, voluntary death in the Buddhist and Brahmanical traditions have been published by Jacques Gernet and Jean Filliozat, stimulating views being developed by these scholars.

To the body of knowledge concerning suicide in India which has been collected and scrutinized up till now I propose in this paper to add the relevant material that can be drawn from another important Indian tradition, that of the Jinas. The Jaina position on the subject of voluntary death is particularly interesting, as Mahāvīra’s community has stressed the salvationist value of asceticism. Moreover, in all matters, Jinism has endeavoured to make a clear-cut and original synthesis out of elements sometimes evidently heterogeneous, some of them being very archaic. To the question ‘Is suicide licit?’ the other Indian communities have pronounced conflicting and, to a certain extent, wavering answers. The Jainas’ position, on the contrary, is well delineated. One form of suicide is allowed and only one. It can take place in definite conditions only and must conform to strict rules, which are laid down minutely. The one form which they expressly allow is death through fasting (anaśana).

In fact, in classical India, this type of voluntary death seems to have normally been advocated or tolerated among the Hindus and among the Buddhists, at least in the case of the individual who is aware that the end of his life is drawing near. On the Ausspräuche der Welse. Aus dem Prākrit der Jainas übersetzt von Walther Schubring (with revised edition of the text, by Schunbring), Hamburg, 1969; Jīvaśāriya), in Hermann Jacobi, The Kalpasūtra of Bhadradēva, Leipzig, 1879 (ref. to paragraph); Nāyādharmakalāda, in Suttāgame (ref. to page and line); S(anthāra), ed.

Āgā; Uvāc(āśaya), ed Leumann (Anp; ref. to paragraph); Uvāc(āgādasā), ed. transl.
A. F. R. Heerw, The Uvāc(āgādasā) or the Religious Profession of an uvācaga, Caliutta, 1888–1890: I Text and Commentary; II Translation (ref. to (lesson and) paragraph); Viy(āhapanallati), in Suttāgame.

For technical terms, I generally quote the Ardha-Māgadhi (= amg.) form in canonical contexts; the Sanskrit (= skr.) form in other developments, specially if it is in common use.

An asterisk after a reference indicates that the text is in verse.

n. 11, referring to Āpastamba Dharma Sūtra 2,22, 4, and 23,2. Cf. Alsdorf, Etudes, 45–46; J. Filliozat, ‘L'abandon de la vie’, 68; Kane, H Dh II 2, p. 926, all quoting Raghunāṇḍa, 8, 94. Also see Kane, H Dh II 2, p. 925 (about Purāṇas). Cf. the prescriptions of the Gauriṣṭha Purāṇa (ed. Calcutta, Śākha 1812/1890 AD), uttara-khaṇḍa 5, 35:

gṛhayāc ced anaśanaṃ vratam vidhiṇaṃ āgataḥ myyoh na so, 'pi saṁsāre bhūyaḥ paraṇaḥ śa...

‘If, when death is drawing near, one correctly undertakes the vow of fasting, then also, one does not, after death, wander in the saṁsāra’; Gaurīṣṭha-Purāṇa-sāroddhāra (ed.-transl. Ernest Wood – S. V. Subrahmanya, Allahabad, 1911), ch. 9, 34–35:
other hand, there is no doubt that ordinary suicide is generally condemned. When teachers do allow voluntary suicide, they stress that it should be a thoughtful, carefully prepared undertaking. Before it can be resorted to, all worldly ties are to be severed: the individual will already be out of this world; and he should be pure in all respects.

As for the conception of voluntary death which prevailed among the Jainas, and for the famous suicides which they extol, I shall prāṇa-praṇāṇa-samaye kṛṣṇād anāśanaṃ . . . \\

\[
miṣto Viṇa-praṇam yāti, na punar jāyate bhāv,
\]

'At the time when the breath is leaving (the body), he should fast . . .'.

As for the Buddhists, Prof. N. Tatla has recently drawn attention to a rule which is laid down in Buddhaghoṣa’s Samantabhadra (N° 463–464). This passage is quoted and discussed by N. Tatla in his article ‘On saṃkeṭhā or Suspension of Aliment’ (Shri Mahāvīr Jaina Vidyālaya Golden Jubilee Volume, Bombay, 1968, 1, p. 139–142). He paraphrases the text thus: ‘The question of the suspension of food and drink by a Buddhist monk is discussed and approved. Should a monk stop taking food and medicine if he is afflicted with long-drawn disease and finds his body incapable of surviving even if carefully tended and nourished, and his attendants tired and exhausted? The answer is in the affirmative. — A monk is also allowed to stop taking food and medicine if he finds his disease acute and is convinced of the imposibility of survival and the attainment of spiritual elevation appears to him as a fait accompli. — Even a monk who is not sick is permitted to do so provided he has developed detachment from fear of the world and considers the begging of food as a hindrance and a handicap and desires to apply himself exclusively to meditation . . .'.

7 Cf. J. Filliozat, loc. cit., passim.

8 Physically or jñāned spiritually; cf. J. Filliozat, loc. cit. In this connection, it is noteworthy that those who choose to die declare their intention solemnly: it thus becomes irrevocable, cf. the ritual for those who give up life in a holy place, as summarized by Kane (H Dh IV 610f.); or the announcement of those who resort to prāṇāṇa-saṃkīrtana (Hoppin, loc. cit. 152 f.); or, again, the preparation of the sāli, who must proclaim her intention, who, if allowed to follow her husband, will have to carry out her pledge (Abraham Roger, La Porte ouverte pour parvenir à la connaissance du Paganisme caché, ch. XX, p. 129), and who, henceforward, is considered a sacred being (Zachariac, Z YVB 1905, 1, p. 86). Further, it has been noted that she throws away the insignia of her household life: ‘elle jette dans le feu [...] un [...] pilon de ris; [...] un petit van [...] et quelque chose davantage, dont les femmes se servent ordinairement dans leur messmage [...].’, Abraham Roger, loc. cit., ch. XX p. 131 (ep. infra p. 63 and n. 78).

Moreover, those who are preparing for a voluntary death are, apparently, often believed to be gifted with clairvoyance, so the sāli (Zachariac, loc. cit. 83; 86–88), the philosopher Kalanās, according to Plutarch and Arrian (ib 87).
collect the evidence mostly from the oldest Jaina Scriptures. Epigraphical and historical records can also furnish various data.

There is no doubt that fasting unto death is one of the supreme austerities, skr. tapas, amg. lāva, lāva, recognized by the Jainas. Tapas, it will be remembered, is twofold, external and internal; again, external tapas, which is sixfold, consists mainly of various kinds of fasts. As a matter of fact, as time went on, tapas, in disciplinary contexts, came to mean all the prescribed sorts of fasting. Now, as any vow can be either transitory (amg. ilāriya, n. 64) or permanent (amg. jāvajīvīnā), it is clear that fasting unto death is but one variety of the first category of tapas. Fasting, on the other hand, is connected with all the sorts of austerity for 9 As there are no fundamental discrepancies between the śvetāmbara and the digambara doctrinal tenets, I shall, for convenience sake, confine myself to the śvetāmbara canonical data; I shall not enter into the scholastic debates.

---

It will appear that, in the books of discipline, there are important differences between the prescriptions contained in the old and the new canonical treatises; on the other hand, that the rules given in digests composed in the 19th cent. conform to the regulations formulated in the latest strata of the Canon.

Moreover, it will be remembered that the rules laid down in the oldest strata of the Jaina Scriptures are meant mainly for the nir-granthi, the religious, ‘free from (worldly and spiritual) bonds’. When the later Canonical books show interest in the layman, they do no more than adjust the old monastic prescriptions. In the Middle Ages, when the Jaina doctors expressed a keen interest in the lay-follower and traced detailed codes of behaviour for him, the devotee even then was proposed a scale of perfections such that, for a limited or unlimited period, his life, so to speak, coincides with life in religion (cf. R. Williams, Jaina Yoga, p. XVI).

10 According to the Jainas, tapas is a means—a necessary means—on the Path to Deliverance. Apart from its technical disciplinary meaning (n. 11–13), the word can also, in Jaina literature, have its etymological sense, ‘ferveur’, ‘(creative) ardour’ (compare infra p. 51 and n. 29).

11 sabbhadatta-bāhirāya, Uvau § 30; etc.; cf. Lehre §§ 178–179; Calliat, Explications, p. 109, ubi alia.

12 chayvhithe panyatłe... aquasace, onoyariyā, bhikkhabīrīyā, rasa-paricāē, kāyakilese, padosanipītaya, ‘... to suppress meals; to reduce food, equipment, emotions; to beg; to give up dainties; to mortify one’s body (through ascetic postures, etc.); to retire into oneself and into solitude’, Uvau § 30 I–VI.

14 Therefore with the internal tapas, which also is sixfold: pāyacchillaṇq, viqae [sic], veyavaccaṇq, sajñha, jhāyaṇ, viqasaggo [sic]: ‘to confess, and atone for one’s faults; to be well behaved and trained; to serve the Community, etc.; to study; to meditate; to renounce one’s body, etc.’ (Uvau § 30 I–VI’, etc.). Study is often considered as one of the best forms of tapas.
the articles of the Doctrine cannot be isolated from one another: the practice of one form of tapas thus more or less involves the practice of all of them.

It is natural that a creed which believes in the saving power of tapas should endeavour to derive benefit from it, especially at crucial instants, when death is drawing near. The Jaina, therefore, like many other Indians, try to determine the conditions which, for one preparing for 'death in perfect conditions' (samādhimaṇḍana), will lead to good rebirth, or, even, to 'perfection' (siddhi), i.e. deliverance (muktī), sometimes also called nirvāṇa. They consider that these conditions can be realized if one knows how to fast correctly unto death.

Fasting unto death is alluded to in many passages of the Jaina Canon which, on the other hand, also gives detailed descriptions and instructions on the subject. Indications are found 1. in chapters relating legends of the saints (which are stereotyped); 2. in some of the either very old, or, on the contrary, quite new treatises dealing with the discipline of the religious. This 'death in perfect dispositions' is the 'wise man's death' (paṇḍita-maṇḍana), it should be accepted and voluntary (sakāma-maṇḍana). It is summed up in the following cliché: (...) bhūlitaṇ aṣaṇāṇa chedillā āloiyā-paṭikkante samāhi-patte kāla-māṣe kālāṃ kiccā ..., the believer 'by remaining without food has suppressed (sixty/many) meals; he has confessed, repented (and atoned); he has attained perfect dispositions; he has done with his lifetime after one month . . .'. According to most of the texts, this controlled suicide needs a long preparation; and only exceptional individuals will be able to perform such an heroic feat.

---

16 The Jaina define death as the blowing up (samudghāta) of the atoms of life; it can greatly disturb the mental equilibrium of the panic-stricken individual (n. 71). — As is well-known, it is a common belief in India that the last moments of the creature are of paramount importance. The Jaina share this view.

16 Uvas § 100; cf. 88; 116; 119; etc. Minor variants of this cliché are met with. It is found frequently, see Uvas, Uvas, Vīy ... Hoernle shows that kāla-māṣe kālāṃ kiccā does not specify the exact duration of the process, but is just a general formula, Uvas II p. 61, n. 161.
Let us first consider the legends. The legends of the saints who thus put an end to their own lives form the subject of three books, in the first section of the Śvetāmbara Canon. Two of them, the Antaṇḍaṣṭūṣaṇa and the Aṇuṭṭaravāṇāyayāṣṭāna, retrace the careers of monks, the third one, the Uvāsagadasaṇa, the careers of a series of lay-followers. The general scheme is more or less identical in all cases. It reproduces or remoulds the legend of the religious Khandaga, an episode inserted in the Viyāhaṇapannatti. The principal events of his life can be summarized thus.

Khandaga Kaccāyaṇa was an accomplished brāhmaṇa. But he becomes aware of the lacunae of the brahmanic tradition. He is converted by Mahāvīra’s preaching, takes the five ‘great vows’, and thus becomes a niggantha. It is worthy of note that one of the sermons which Mahāvīra preaches bears, precisely, upon death. Mahāvīra says, ‘There are two kinds of death: the fool’s death (bāla-maraṇa), and the wise man’s death (pāṇḍiya-maraṇa).’ Transmigration will not cease for him who dies the fool’s death—of which twelve types are reckoned with: that of the man who kills himself in consequence of moral weakness; or of physical weakness; or who dies without confession; or with some craving or other; or throwing himself from the top of a mountain; or of a free; or drowning himself; or burning himself; or drinking poison; or using a weapon; or hanging himself; or 17 This heroic death is also extolled elsewhere, for instance Isibhāṣṭīya, no. 45 (51); 6 (‘mette’). Ullar 35, 201. and 36, 249 (on which see SBE 45, p. 229 n. 4; also L. Aisendorf, ‘The Ārya Stanzas of the Uttarajāhāyā ...’, Abh. der Geistes- und Sozialwiss. Kl., 1966, 2, Ak. der Wiss. und der Lit. Mainz, p. 163 = 11 of the off-print); Uvav (cf. n. 16); etc.

---

18 Cfr., more briefly, Ambaṇa’s career and achievements, Uvav §§ 89–116; his seven hundred disciples’ death, ib. 82–88.

For an English translation of this stereotyped development, see Barnett, Antaṇḍa-dasā, p. 54–61 (generally quoted infra).

20 The maha-vaṇas, Lebre 171 (not to hurt a living creature; not to lie; not to steal; not to sin against chastity; not to be attached to any possession).

21 Vīy 421, 6–7: mae duvite maraṇe paṇḍitte, tam-jahā, bāla-maraṇe ya paṇḍiya-maraṇe ya ... (cf. Deleu, II 190 2).

4 Acta Orientalia, XXXVIII offering his body to birds of prey. On the contrary, the number of rebirths will be drastically reduced for the man who dies the wise man’s death. Two types are taught here: death by starvation, accompanied by complete immobility, pāva-gaṃaṇa, and the ‘renunciation of food’, bhutta-paccakkhaṇa. In the first case, the dying man must abstract himself totally from his body, which will not be taken care of at all; in the other case, the bodily needs will be paid some attention.

Thus converted, Khandagāja begins his true spiritual career. He first leads the perfect religious life. When he is well trained, he requests from Mahāvīra permission to apply himself to various increasingly hard austerities. He trains in all kinds of fasts and ascetic exercises. So, he ‘moulds’, ‘creates’ himself, —that is, he sanctifies himself, as some translators write, by accomplishing austere mortifications. At this point, the text introduces a description of the saint, using stock phrases: ‘So by this noble,

\[\text{\footnote{But three types in Āyār 1, Infra p. 59.}}\]

\[\text{\footnote{Skr. prāyāganama (Leumann, Aup, gl., s.v.), ‘entering into trespass’. But the commentaries generally render the first term as pādo-pa- (ib). Cf. Alsdorf, Etudes, 45-46.}}\]

\[\text{\footnote{Skr. bhakta-pratyākhyāna.}}\]

\[\text{\footnote{On these distinctions, Lebre § 165, ubi alia; also Deleu, p. 90.}}\]

\[\text{\footnote{Barnett’s trsl. (except [ ], added by me), p. 57. Viy 423, 30 – 424, 9: leṇaṃ orāṇeṣu viṇālaṇeṣu pājālaṇeṣu pagahāraṇeṣu kalādaṇeṣu śīvaṇeṣu δhāmānep̣aṁ maṇghajalgaṇaṇeṣu sasriṅgaṇeṣu udādheṣu udāleṣeṇa uddhaneṣu udāreṣu mañghahuḥ bhāgaṇeṣu tawokammeṇaṁ, sukhe lakkhe nīmaṃsaḥ atthi-cumudakarīddhe kaṭṭikaṇḍeṣe ṭhe kāse dhāmaṇi-santrae jāye vā tā holtā; jīvaṇjaiva gåcchā jīvanjaiva cīlha; bhāṣaṇaḥ bhāṣaṅga vi gilā bh. bhāṣaṅga vi gilātī bh. bhāṣaṅga vi gilā; se jahā nāmae – kāṭha-saṅgaṇī jā vā palla-sa. vā palla-līla-bhāṅga-sa. tā eṇuḍe-sa. vā ingaṇa-saṅgaṇī jā vā, uṣhe dinnā sukkha ṣamādi, savādhaṁ gåcchā sas. cīlha; evām evā Khandacā vā apagāre sa. g. sas. c.; uvačite laveṇaṁ uvačite maṃsa-soṇeṇaṁ hūyāśaṇe}}\] abundant, zealous, earnest, happy, blissful, lucky, auspicious, splendid, lofty, magnificent, excelling, exalted, stately mortification, [Khandaga] became withered, wizened, fleshless; he became a mere frame of bone and skin; he grew so that his bones rattled, emaciated, overspread with veins. It was by force of spirit alone that he walked and he halted. He was faint after speaking, and in speaking, and before speaking. As forsooth a cart full of sticks, or of leafage, or of oil-seed and jars and leafage, or of castor-oil sticks, or of coals, that has been put out in the heat and dried up, goes with a creaking and halts with a creaking, so [Khandaga] went with a creaking and halted with a creaking, being piled high with mortification and piled low with flesh and blood, and like an [oblation-devouring] fire confined within a heap of ashes he shone mightily with glow [lapas], with lustre [tejas], and with splendour of glowing lustre [lapas + tejas].

Then, during his religious vigil, in the middle of the night, Khandaga sums up the situation: he considers all the signs of his physical weakness, but, at the same time, he knows he has two advantages. First, he is still possessed of 'energy, work, power, vigour, manly force, prowess'; secondly, he has the benefit of Lord Mahāvira's spiritual guidance. Therefore, he decides to take advantage of these favourable circumstances: 'On the morrow, when the night shall have lightened into dawn and the sun shall arise in golden lustre', Khandaga will approach Mahāvīra and will pay due homage to him. Mahāvīra already knows of the resolution of his disciple: he grants him necessary permission. Khandaga takes leave of the Master. He solemnly takes the five monastic vows (thus he renews his ordination, so to speak), he asks for forgiveness from all those whom he may have wronged or injured.31

Then, surrounded by accomplished theras, he ascends Mount Vipula (near Rajgrī), and looks for a dry slab of stone-like earth, which he inspects.32 The text continues: he 'spread a bed of darbha-grass, sat thereupon in a squatting posture with his face to the east, raised to his head the ten fingers of his hands clasped before his forehead with joined palms', and recited the appropriate formulas: the homage33 to the five categories of the Saints, the Perfect Ones, the Masters, Teachers and Religious; followed by homage to Mahāvīra.34

He repeats the five Great Vows, and solemnly renounces the four kinds of food (thus including liquids); he renounces his body, and, observing the uninterrupted fast called samāneṭha, he sits motionless, 'waiting without eagerness for death by wasting away in starvation'.35

31 sayam eva pañca mahāvargāṃ druti idda samage ya samagīto ya khāmei..., ib, 425, 4-5.
32 khāmei idda lāhārāvathīṃ therehiṃ kaṇḍāthiṃ saddhiṃ Vipulaṃ paṇṇayaṃ saṇghaṃ 2 durāhe... puṇḍhav-sīlā-vattayaṃ paṭilehe... ib, 5-6. — Concerning puṇḍhav-sīlā-vatta(ya) or patta(ya), puṇḍhav-sīlā-pattaka, 'a stone platform of earth', 'a masonry platform', Hronic, Udās 11, 107 n. 251, ad Udās 6 § 164.
33 dabbha-sāpādhārāyaṃ sāpādhara idda puratthādhārāye saṇḍhiṣyaktaka-nisanne karayala-pātigāhāyaṃ dasa-nahāyaṃ strasdevatāya matthāy anjāthiṃ kasti, evam vadati 'nāmo 'tittha..., ib, 7 foll. — Dabbha-: cp. the ritual in Hopkins, loc. cit., p. 152; but Āyār 1, 'tāna', grass, or straw (Intra, n. 65a).
34 'vandāmi ānāṃ Bhagavatānāṃ ... ', Vīy 425, 10.
35 Barnett's trsl.

puṇṇita pi... evam ānāṃ suṣṭhiḥ... Bha. M. anitī suṣṭhim pāṇāvyāyaṃ paccakkhāmī jāvaññāde jāva mithyaṃsucaritaṃ paccakkkhiṃ, evam suṣṭhiḥ asaṇgāṃ pāṇāṃ kha. sā. caṇuṭhānaṃ pāṇāṃ paccakkhāmī jāvaññāde, jāva pi... evam ānāṃ suṣṭhiḥ... evam pi... evam... vissamīti lītī kasti samāneṭha-dhāteṣu-dhāteṣu bhūtta-pāṇā-paṭṭiyāk-kkhiṃ paṇṇayaṃ kālaṃ avakakkanāthaṃ vīṭhātī, 'Previously (..., I have for all my life renounced all harm to living beings...), now also in front of the Samaṇa... I renounce...'; ib, 11-18.
The text sums up Khandaga’s religious life: after having studied the sacred texts, fulfilled the life of a perfect and heroic nigganta for twelve years, he ‘wasted himself away in starvation, withheld from himself sixty meals’, ‘confessed, repented (and made appropriate atonement), he correctly attained the perfect religious dispositions, and he progressively ended his life’.

His companions, knowing that he has passed away, observe the rites of renunciation which should favour Khandaga’s nīvāṇa. They collect his religious insignia, descend Mount Vipula, inform Mahāvīra, and give him the robe and bowl of their dead companion. Questioned, Mahāvīra answers that Khandaga will be reborn as a god in one of the highest heavens; and that, after an ultimate rebirth, in the Mahāvideha Continent, he will reach Deliverance.

This passage of the Viy(āhapannatti) is perfectly clear; samplahaṇā cannot be resorted to except after a long, progressive training, a life in which every progress has been tested. In Khandaga’s spiritual career, three stages are registered: 1. the perfect observance of all vows; 2. the observance of more and more difficult austerities; 3. then,—and only because circumstances were favour-

44 Barnett’s trsl. (with changes).

45 Acce coppe devadāre uvavanne ... Mahāvidehe vāse stijhihitu bavijhihitu mucihihit pariṇovihiti suva-dukkhāyaṁ antaraṁ korehi, ib, 426, 5–10.

46 Cp. J. Filliozat, ‘La mort volontaire’, specially p. 31; 45f. The author shows how the Buddhist arhat is systematically trained by Buddhist discipline, so that, in the end, he is psychically detached and corporeally insensible. His soul is absolutely free. He sees his individuality as an object from which he is totally disassociated. If, then, he puts an end to his life, his act is absolutely passionless. He just gets rid of his mortal coil, which has become altogether vain and useless. His death can, to a certain extent, be compared with that of the Buddha himself who, according to the Mahāparinibbāṇa-sutta, let death away the constituents of life, the vital principles (supra n. 35; also n. 6, on Buddhaghosa’s position). In brahmanism, cf. J. Filliozat, ‘L’abandon de la vie’, particularly p. 68.
able, the final ordination, the ultimate irrevocable departure from the world. After this long course of correct training, the soul knows how to conduct and control its present earthly journey unto the end. In the above case, assistance is moreover given by a group of accomplished theras. 39

It is not surprising that degrees are observed in Khandaga's spiritual career: Mahāvīra himself had awakened but gradually. 40
This is also the case in most legends of religious suicides which form the Antagoṇadasāṇa and the Ayuttarovovāiyadasāṇa: these legends, obviously, are just slight variants of the suicide of Khandaga: the careers are identical, they are described with the help of the same stock phrases, show the same landmarks, and culminate in the final pāvagamaṇa fast, on the summits of Satrunjaya, or of Girnar, or of Parasnath. This being the general pattern, it happens that some details are amplified. For instance, when the portrait of 'Fortunate' Dhanna is traced, each element of his body, emanciated by the mortifications, is compared to dry and withered fragments. 41

One curious hybrid variant may be mentioned here. It is related to Nemi's and Kaṇha's (Kṛṣṇa's) legendary cycle. It tells the story of Kaṇha's younger brother, Prince Gayasukumāla of 39 tahārvahinpī therabhīṃ kājāthiṃ saddhīṃ ... Vīy 424, 21–22; etc. Is this detail comparatively late (cp. the dabbha grass, supra n. 33)? It contrasts with the solitude requested in Āyār 1 (infra 57). In Nāgādharmakohā 1, § 36 (ed. Suttāgama 976, 5), it is explicitly stated that theras 'uncreasingly serve' the fasting Meha:

lae ąṇṇ te thörā bhagavanto Mehasa aṇagārassas agilāte veyāvāśyamu kareṇāt.

40 He first follows the ordinary religious course for two years and two months;
then, for twelve years, he leads his ascetic life, progressing until he attains kevala.
After forty-two years of monkhood, he is perfected, accomplished, and his life is extinguished. As tradition will have it, he dies in the Plains, at Pāvā (Pāpā), in King Ḥathhipāla's secretariat (cf. the summary of his ascetic career, Leher § 18, fol. following Āyār 1, ch. 9 and Jīṣa 139 (ariya) §§ 110 foll.). — According to the same tradition, reported in Jīṣa, the two Prophets who had preceded Mahāvīra died: Aṭṭaṭhamañi, the twenty-second, 'in the company of 536 monks', on one of the summits of Girnar's mountain; and the twenty-third, Pāsa, 'in the company of 83 persons on the highest peak of Mount Sarnathar, Jīṣa §§ 168; 182.

41 Ayuttarovovāiyadasāṇa, ch. 3, 1. Cf. text and translation in Barnett, loc. cit., 128–134; 112–120.

The Meha(kumāra) episode, Nāgādharmakohā book 1, §§ 35 foll., also inserts various amplifications (cf. supra n. 39).
Bāravaī (Dvāravaī). He is married to lovely Somā, the daughter of the brahmins Somīla and Somasiri. But, having heard Ariṭṭhanemi’s preaching, he is converted, and renounces worldly life. In fact, he is already possessed of the highest spiritual knowledge and vigour. Therefore, he is immediately allowed to meditate in a lonely, terrifying cemetery. Somīla, meanwhile, had gone ‘eastward from the city of Bāravaī for fuel, and gathered faggots, darbha-grass, kuśa-spikes, and leafy twigs’. He returns, and passing by the solitary graveyard, he sees Gayasukumāla, and ‘he recalled his spite and fell into a rage ... He took some moist clay ... stuck it like an earthen bowl on Gayasukumāla’s head, from a pyre took in a pot flaming coals of khadira-wood, like blooming kīpśuka flowers, and cast them upon ... Gayasukumāla’s head. Then in fear ..., he departed speedily ...’. Gayasukumāla, who is deep in meditation, bears this ‘fiery, abounding, violent, furious, vehement, grievous, bitter, and intolerable pain ... in a blessed spirit, with fine resolution ... and in him arose boundless, supreme, ... absolute knowledge and vision; and thereupon he became ... free from all sorrows’.
The gods celebrate this great spiritual victory.

Is this tragic chapter a comparatively recent development? Some details, particularly the suddenness of Gayasukumāla’s spiritual attainments, are obviously late.

---

45 In the present context, probably in both literal and figurative senses.

This trial appears to be both a test of the progress already accomplished, and a means to further accomplishment (cf. Uvās). Its importance is obvious in the text (perhaps somewhat blurred in Barnett’s translation): taṃ yaṃ lassa Gayasukumāḷassā ayaṇārassa tathā ujjataṃ jāva ahīyāsemāṃśassa subheṣu pariṇāyeṇaṃ passattath’ajjhanāyaṇeṇaṃ, tayāvarisajjāṇaṃ kammānaṃ khāṇaṃ kamma-ruja-vikiriṇa-karaṃ apuvakaraṇaṃ apuppinīṭhassāya ayaṇa ayaṇaṃ jāva kevala-varaṇāṇa-dveṣaṃ samuppajjante; taṃ paccā pāchā jāva ppaṭipāya, ‘as he bore this fiery ... pain with an auspiciously developing spirit, with blessed application,—then, because the hindering kammass were annihilated, as he had entered the apuvaka-raṇa stage which scatters the mark of kamma—in him arose ...’, 1170, 1–4.

Lay devotees who fasted unto death form the subject of the Uvāsagadasāṇa. Mutatis mutandis, the narrative is very similar to the above relations.

The hero, generally a rich merchant, is converted by Mahāvīra’s or some other saint’s sermons. He takes the layman’s five Minor Vows and consolidates them by a series of lesser observances. He follows them as best he can during a first period, which, generally, lasts for about fourteen years.

In the course of the fifteenth year, he sees how difficult it is to observe the Law strictly while living in the turmoil of the world. Therefore, he hands his business over to his eldest son, announces that he should not be consulted further about it, and forbids any food to be prepared for him. He retires to his vigil house (posuha-sālā), where he will be able to be absorbed in meditation. There, he stretches out on a bed of darbha-grass, and lives in conformity with the Jaina teachings. His austerities are such that he becomes ‘withered, wizened, fleshless . . .’, the above cliché being used in this circumstance also.

At this point, in the first story concerning the lay-follower, the devotee sees a supernatural vision: it proves the spiritual progress of this man, who, in fact, has ascended the whole scale of perfection, as far as a layman can.

Then, and then only, he undertakes the samājhaṇa fast, thanks to which he will be reborn in one of the highest heavens, and, ultimately, in the Mahāvideha continent, where he will awaken and obtain Deliverance.

Here again, three main stages are distinguished. It happens that the first of these, in some stories, is troubled by various trials: the devotee is victorious, thanks either to his own spiritual 46 mahāvāgas, Lehre 170. They are similar to the mahāvāgas, but milder.

---

48 ib, 1, § 69, etc.—Cf. n. 33.
49 ib, § 72, etc.
50 ib, § 74.
52 Uvās 1, §§ 89–90, etc.
power, or to some external assistance, when, after an initial defeat, some other Jaina believer, a member of his family, helps him to recover and to win the supreme fight.

Let us now consider the books of discipline. The rules concerning religious suicide are detailed in a series of late pamphlets (infra p. 60), and in the first section of the first book of the Śvetāmbara Canon, the Āyār(anga), one of the 'seniors' of the canonical treatises.

In this book, the narration of Mahāvira's ascetic life is preceded by the chapter called vimoho, 'deliverance'. This chapter gives a conspectus of the different types of fast unto death, and, also, states what training they suppose, how and when they should be observed if they are to lead to the highest goal.

Three types are here mentioned, and described in a poem which develops this concise prose sentence: kāyam ca jogaṁ ca iriyam ca paccakkhaejjā, the nissanta 'shall renounce 1. his body, 2. activity (of body, voice and mind, as far as they are conducive to bondage of karman), 3. motion' (Āyār 1, 38, 21). In the first case, the bhikkhu simply abstains from food (bhutta-paccakkhāna); in the second case, he abstains from food and limits his movements (ingiṁ- maraṇa); in the third case, he abstains from food, and, as far as possible, he altogether abstains from moving (pāṇāgamana). Obviously, in the last mentioned case, the dying man receives no help from anyone. In all three cases, he has previously gone through a course of progressively more severe mortifications; and he has proved his spiritual mastery.

Āyār describes his long training thus: first, 'for one who applies himself to tapas, it is preferable to repair, alone, to the forest':

---

54 Alsdorf, Etudes, p. 28, quoting Schubring.
56 Āyār 1, 38, 23* – 40, 8*: āryās. The three types of death, 39, 5* – 40, 8*.
57 Cf. supra n. 24.
58 The Anāgadāna and Aṇuvattaropadāya legends give a milder picture: the saint, while observing pāṇāgamana, is surrounded by well trained theras. Cf. infra, the Pañcaiyas' regulation (see n. 39). On the fear of solitude, Callicott, Explations, 55; 117.
tavassino hu lam sayan jan s'ège viham âie, (36, 10*). His baggage, his clothing, and his food are systematically reduced (36, 14–21; 37, 3 foll.). He practises the Law as best he can. His proficiency becomes such that he is fully conscious of the essential distinction between his soul (jīva, which, alone, is ’life’, according to the Jaina doctrine), and his empirical appearance, which is different from his real self.⁶⁹ Therefore, he rightly grows tired of his body, which cannot any more be of any help to him, but has become a vain hindrance.⁶⁰ Consequently, he reduces his food more and more; and, at the same time, what is left of his passions,⁶¹ until, it is said, he is as thin as a plank,⁶² he is no more than a shadow.

At this stage, he goes to the nearest inhabited place, where he will beg for grass (tāpa, skr. ṭṛṇa).⁶³ Then, he will look for a suitable halting place, and will carefully remove all dust, so as not to hurt any living creature: he spreads the straw; and, having selected the favourable time, he applies himself to limited fasts.⁶⁴

In the third stage, when his self-mastery is such that he is able to bear all sorts of persecutions, for instance, the biting of cold, of insects, the prickling of grass, etc., and the shame of being ⁶⁹ (tassa bhikkhassa) . . . evam bhavat: ’ego ahum apst; na me atti ko, na yham avi kassal’, evam sa egādham eva appāvan samabhijñegjā, ’it occurs to this monk: ’I am one and alone; no one belongs to me, nor do I belong to any one’: he should thus recognize his oneness . . .’, Āyār 1, 37, 7–9; compare (n. 72) Candāvejijāhā 160–161 (and, on these stōkas, Caillat, p. 149). Cf. a similar disconnection aimed at in the Buddhist training, n. 38.

⁶⁰ ’se gilāna ca khalu ahum imammi samac īmaṃ satiragaṃ anupumpeṇaṃ pari-vahillate’, ’I am tired, in the present circumstances, of continuing to load this miserable body of mine’, Āyār 1, 37, 14–15 (whereas, previously, the body had played a role in the struggle towards Deliverance, cf. nīkkhasākāra-henussa sāhu-dehassa, Dasar 5, 1, 92 e–d).

⁶¹ se anupumpeṇaṃ dhāranas saṇghaṃ bhājatā . . . ’kasā deyai ca kīcch’, ib 16–17.,

⁶² phalaṅgojanjñhi, ib, 37, 18* (on the second term of the compound, Ācār, Gloss., s.n., ph.).

⁶³ anupawissati gāmaṇaṃ vā . . . , taṅgaṃ jātā, ib., 20–22.

⁶⁴ taṅgiṃ jātā se itam ājīva evamān avakkamejā . . . paṅkhejīga 2 paṅgajīga 2 taṅgaṃ saṇghaṃ bhājatā, taṅgaṃ saṇghaṃ bhājatā ca iti vi samac iḷḷiryaṃ kujjā, ’having begged for grass, he shall take it and go to a secluded place . . .; after inspection and cleaning, he shall spread the grass; and, in due time, he shall devote himself to transitory (fasts)’, ib, 22–28.

On ittīriya, ittī-, *ittvaraka, Ācār, Gloss., s.n.; Worte, p. 112 and n. 3 (’Fastenübungen’).
totally naked\textsuperscript{65}—if it is certain that he can follow the rules perfectly, that he is tired of and detached from his physical individuality,\textsuperscript{65a} he undertakes one or the other of the three kinds of unlimited fasts.

The gāthās which describe them are elliptic, and difficult.\textsuperscript{66}

The main points are the following.

In the first kind of death,

[I] gā. 7. ‘Whether in a village or in a forest, the muni shall examine the ground, and, knowing it to be free from living beings, he shall spread the straw.

8. Without food, he shall lie down on it, and bear the pains which attack him . . . He shall not, before the (right) time, go (among men) . . .

10. Animals attack his body: he shall not stir from his place.

[II] 12. This other Law has been taught by Nāyaputta: (the muni) shall give up all motion, . . .

15. (Exceptionally,) he may move to and fro, contract and stretch his limbs to keep his body bound (with his soul); or he remains consciousnessless . . .

16. . . . If tired from his ascetic posture, he may sit down . . .

\textsuperscript{65} ib, 38, 13–19.

\textsuperscript{65a} ib, 38, 20 (cf. 37, 14–26, supra): ‘se gilāmi ca khala ahaṃ . . .’ tāpatīthi sānt-tharellā ettha vi sārue kāyam ca jāgoṇam ca irīyaṁ ca paccakkhañjñā.

\textsuperscript{66} Cf. Jacobi, translation, SBE 22, p. 74–78. It must be revised, following Schubring, Worle Mahāvīras, 113–115.

7. gāme vā adu vā rānāḥ tathālāṁ paṭṭilādhā appa-paṇḍaṁ tu vināyo tāpatīthi sāntihare munti.
8. aṅgāhāro tuśalējā, puṭṭho tattā ahāyāhae, ndiścaṇa uvacare . . .
10. pāṇḍa dehaṁ vihānsauti—tāhāno na viubbhane . . .
12. ayaṁ se ariye dhamme Nāyaputteye sāhte:
. . . pāṭiyāraṁ vijāhejja . . .
15. abbhikkame paṭikkame sāṅkamye pasārām kāya-sāhārapalṭhā, etthaṁ vā vī acayahe.
16. . .
īhaṁ na parikīlate naśeṣe jā ya . . .
19. ayaṁ c’āgayatere sīyā jơ evaṁ agupalaṁ:
svatva-pāyā-niruđhe vī ṭhāṇo na viubbhane.
20. ayaṁ se uttame dhamme piṇva-ṭhāṇassa pāṇahe . . .
[III] 19. Still more heroic is he who follows (the third method): he shall, while checking all motion of the body, not stir from his place (/position).
20. This is the higher Law, superior to the preceding method(s).'

Then, Āyār recapitulates some basic tenets of Jainism, on which the muni should concentrate.
Gāthā 25 concludes: 'Totally undisturbed, he reaches the end of his life. — When one knows that there is nothing above forbearance, one or the other of these three paths of Deliverance is salutary':

sauv'ajjhehiṇ amucchie āu-kālassa pārae;
līkkhaṃ paramaṃ naccā vimoh'annayaraṃ hiyaṃ.

Thus, this old disciplinary text expressly requests a long, minute training, in the course of which the doctrinal knowledge, the physical and moral abilities of the religious are unceasingly controlled: whatever progress there is must be tested. Severe as they are, the austerities are never recommended as such, but only in so far as the religious will tolerate them,—in so much as they are fruitful, and evidently lead to the highest Goal.

Whereas the Āyāranga groups very old prescriptions, the book of the Pāññayās, or 'Miscellanea' is of late composition. Here, the general conditions are not so grim, the requirements are comparatively mild, though the fundamental attitude has remained the same.

I shall not go into all the details that are mentioned in the various pamphlets collected in this section of the Śvetāmbara Canon. Two trends of thought can be distinguished, according to the emphasis laid on the previous training; in all cases, however, the dying man is expressly assisted unto the last by his guru.

Some information will first be gleaned from the Candāv(ejjhaya), which appears to be comparatively traditional. The main stages of the religious life are analysed: first, that of the novice, receiving 68 Some Śvetāmbaras even deny the authenticity of the P., see Alsdorf, Blüten, 31.

---

69 See Kurt von Kampf, Über die von Sterbefasten handelnden älteren Pāñça des Jainaka-Canons. — Also 'Bhagavati Ārādhana': analysis by A. N. Upadhye, in Brahat Kathākośa (Bombay, 1963), p. 50–51 (and, on the meaning of ārādhanā, p. 47).
a good education; later, that of the mature monk, who should be proficient in ascetic discipline as well as in the superior religious knowledge; then comes the culminating point of the monk's career, when he will have to die the wise man's death. The Candāv here emphasizes that this last stage has to be prepared by constant exercise, that it requires unflinching watchfulness and the total purity of spiritual life. This requirement is fulfilled through confession, repentance, atonement, in the presence of one's guru, guru-saṁyāsā (gāthā 151). His presence is absolutely necessary: for who can possibly foresee how he will react at the time of disintegration, in the face of death? Being well trained, having performed all these preparatory rites, the muni takes his place on his death-bed (saṁthāra, skr. saṁśīra-). Then, having confessed, repented, made atonement, he is absorbed in meditation on religious themes. One should concentrate, it is said, on the scriptural phrases, or words, which have previously proved spiritually efficient, for they will be propitious at the instant of death also. This is how, with the assistance of one's spiri-

---

11 Candāv 150:

handi baliyaṇṭ pi dhīrā, pucchā, maraṇe uvaṭṭhe sante, maraṇa-saṁyāsānaṁ avasa niñjanti miechallagā,

'At last even the firm and wise, later, when death is imminent, because of the blowing up that is death, are against their will, drawn towards error.'

Cp. Matsya Purāṇa 182, 22–25, quoted and translated in Kane, HDr IV 611 foll. and n. 1389:

anta-kāle maruṣyapāṇaḥ chidāpyāneśu marmeśu vāyūna prajñapāṇanāṁ smṛtir napoṣanāgāte,

'at the time of death when the vital parts of the human body are being shattered, memory must fall a human being that is about to be pushed on (to another body) by the vital breath (when it leaves the mortal coil).'

12 Candāv 159–169:

saṁthāraṇa paṁdvamante ṇamo hiṃśaṇā cinteyā: (159 c–d),
'ekko ne sāsao appa . . . (160),
'ekko 'haṇi n'ālthi ne koi n'ālthi vā kassal ahaṇi (161);

d etc., enumerating various agupakēhās (compare 160–161 and Āyār 1, 37, 7–9, n. 59).
13 Candāv 93–95 (and others; cf. Calliat, p. 52 for concordances):

ekammā vi jammi paśe saṁveṇamati viyārāya-maggammi vaccati naro abhiṭṭhāhaṇa laṇi maraṇ'ante na mottawāṇi (Candāv 93).
tual master, one can die a pure death, leading to perfect Attainment.

The paramount importance of the last moments is considerably stressed in other Pāññayās: for instance, in the Bhuttapaccakkhaṇa ('Renouncing of food') and the Saṃthāra ('Deathbed'), where the last rites are detailed.74 In these booklets, there is, as it were, a shift of emphasis: they do not insist on the necessity of a hard, lifelong training; this, apparently, could be replaced by the ceremonial which they teach. Moreover, they apparently make no basic difference between the lay-follower and the monk, whose case they examine jointly.75

Whereas the Āyār required a long experience, a hard ascetic training, before the monk would be allowed to fast unto death, the younger texts seem mainly to consider objective circumstances: old age, illness, difficult material conditions, etc.76

The Bh(atta-paccakkhaṇa) and S(aṃthāra) prescribe the scrutiny of the place and the death-bed; and the preparation of the devotee spiritually (S 53-54). The dying man should have time enough to make himself ready for death, and to perform a sort of rehearsal.

First, he should solemnly proclaim his decision, in the presence of his guru, whose help he asks for (Bh 17-18). He further must know, accept, and observe the three conditions of the 'wise man's death': confession, expiation of his faults, and renewal of the Jaina Vows (Bh 19; 27-29). Then, the man takes his place on his death-bed, thus signifying that he is henceforth no longer in the world.77

Now comes an intermediate phase,—of renunciation. Master

---

74 See the critical detailed analysis of Bh and S and, moreover, of the relevant passages from other Pāññayās, in Kamptz, Sterbefasten, p. 8 foll.; specially p. 18 foll.

75 Cf. Bh 28-29.

76 Bh 14; S 32; Kamptz, p. 18. Cf. the Brahmanic dispositions discussed by Kane, H Dh II, 2, 926; Buddhaghosa's statements (supra n. 6); the decision of the Indian 'philosopher' Kalanas who, being more than seventy, and being afflicted with illness, requests Alexander to have a funeral pyre prepared for him and perishes in its flames (Diodorus Siculus XVII, 107, etc., often quoted).

77 Cf. Bh 33: saṃthāraya-pamassjām pamassjai ... and disciple have proclaimed the refusal of food, and the dying man solemnly renounces three sorts of aliments (out of the four which, in the Jaina phraseology, form the normal meal). He gives all his belongings away, even his unnecessary religious paraphernalia. Henceforward, he is outside the Community.\footnote{Rh 34–39; Kamptz, p. 19. Cp. the saff distributing her jewels, throwing her household utensils into the funeral pyre (n. 8).}

Then, the final purifying rites take place: the dying man absorbs potions that should act as purgatives and sedatives.\footnote{Bh 40 foll.} Whereas the assistants engage in helpful rites (Bh 44–45), the dying man renounces the four sorts of food: he will thus also abstain from all liquids. He asks for forgiveness, and himself forgives (Bh 47–49). He listens to his master’s discourse, for the guru’s words are like a beverage of immortality. The guru assists and instructs his disciple,\footnote{agusaffthhu del gat-vasahe, Bh 52.} recalling the fundamental tenets of the Right Faith, reminding his pupil of the legendary saints who have died this wise man’s death,\footnote{Bh 52 foll. On the help that can be derived from the evocation of heroic deeds, Gonda, Remarks on Similes in Sanskrit Literature (Leiden 1940), p. 79 foll.} and he helps him to keep his mind absorbed in auspicious meditation.

When he passes away, the monk who has followed this path can attain Deliverance either immediately, or after his third rebirth.\footnote{S 117, etc. The number of rebirths mentioned is sometimes seven (Kamptz, 21).} The layman is reborn in blissful heavens. Whether the dead man was a religious or a lay-follower, the consequences of the bad deeds which had been heaped up during ages are dispelled in a moment.\footnote{S 115–116, etc. (Kamptz, 22).}

These prescriptions are certainly very far from the stern, terrifying rules, which are laid down in the Āyūr.\footnote{The rules laid down in the Paiṅnakas seem to have remained in force, the case being, ever since (Infra 65). Cf. A. N. Upadhye, in M. M. Poddar Commemoration Volume ['Jainas and Jainism', 157–175], 170.} Preparation for death is milder in the Paiṅnakas, and it has been considerably shortened. Nevertheless, the preparatory purification, the spiritual dispositions required from the dying man do presuppose previous training. In many respects, it appears that, in this case also, life is preparing for death.

The medieval treatises which deal with the lay-believer’s conduct also admit that religious death by starvation is not restricted to the monk. But, on the whole, they do not give much information on this practice, whose aim, it is said, is to help the soul depart from a body that will then be like a dry leaf or a lamp with no oil left.

But some sāṃskṛtās have been particularly notorious: that of the last Rāṣṭrakūṭa (982); and, as is well known, that of King Kumārapāla of Gujarāt who, like his aśāstra Hemacandra, ended his life by starvation (12th cent.). In the same way, the Jainas hold that, in the 4th–3rd cent. B.C., Candragupta Maurya starved to death on the Candragiri Hill at Sravana Belgola.

Be that as it may, the epigraphic evidence shows that this ritual was, in fact, sometimes resorted to, in different holy places of India.

A clear example has been published lately. An inscription, engraved on the Satrunjaya Hill, in the 11th cent. A.D., commemorates the death of Muni Sangamasiddha. It states that he meditated on Mount Satrunjaya, at the feet of the first Prophet, Ṛṣabh; he went through all the ritual purifications; he died in 1006 A.D., having fasted unto death during one month and four days. On the very place where this heroic feat had been achieved, a rich lay-follower had a sanctuary erected, and a statue installed, 86 Quoted ib., 172.

---

87 References in Guérinot, Répertoire d’épigraphie jaina, n° 163.
wishing, says the epigraph, to increase his own merit thanks to these pious donations.\textsuperscript{89}

In South India, in temples, etc., a number of inscriptions are found attesting cases of religious suicides.\textsuperscript{90} They are particularly numerous in Śrāvāna Belagola, one of the holiest centres of the Digambaras,—where more than fifty have been counted in the 7th and 8th centuries. Many of them are now blurred; but we know of their contents thanks to Lewis Rice’s and Narasimhacar’s editions.\textsuperscript{91}

On the hillock where the so-called Candragupta temple is built, on the even, curving surface of the rocky summit, in all directions (but mostly running in a sort of semi-circle from the southwest to the northeast of the temple, facing which they must be read), inscriptions have been engraved on the places where members of the Jaina community have fasted unto death. Most of the epigraphs are very short and stereotyped. Some others are more elaborate, and furnish details which, on the whole, tally with the prescriptions of the Paiṅṇayagas and with a sort of versified Sanskrit summary that had been very popular in these parts of India.\textsuperscript{92}

Among these heroic believers, there have been monks and laypeople, some of them of royal families. The last inscription in this series seems to date from the beginning of the 19th cent. In 1873,

\textsuperscript{89} Ambalal Premchand Shah, ‘Some Inscriptions and Images on Mount Śatruṅ-

\textsuperscript{90} Cf. Guérinot, \textit{loc. cit.} Desai, \textit{loc. cit.}: inscr. n° 19, on a hill-rock, at Kopbal, mentions the samyagasaṃ death, at that place, in the year śaka 803, of ‘the illustrious teacher Sarvanandī Bhājāṇa’; n° 22 (Kopbal) praises the \textit{bhājana-maṇḍapa} ‘of the great teacher Śinḍhanandī who repaired to the summit of this lofty mountain and attained his end under the vow of Voluntary Death renouncing everything’. — Cf. p. 339–343; 345–350.

\textsuperscript{91} L. Rice, \textit{IA} II 1873, \textit{Jain Inscriptions at Śrāvāna Belagola}, I, p. 265–266; II, p. 322–324; id, \textit{Inscriptions at Śrāvāna Belagola a Chief Seat of the Jains} (Bangalore, 1889), a revised edition of which, published by R. Narasimhacharyu, has been revised anew: \textit{Epigraphia Carnatica II, Śrāvanabelgola}, (Institute of Kannada Studies, Univ. of Mysore, 1973), of which see Intr. p. LXXIII., and, for instance, the inscription n° 176 (West face), relating the end of Māchikabelle, a dead queen’s mother.

\textsuperscript{92} The \textit{Rajá Kakaṇḍuka}, by Āyta-Varmmā, quoted, and translated into En-

5 \textit{Acta Orientalia}, XXXVIII
Rice, the first editor of the epigraphs, remarks that it is difficult to ascertain whether this practice is still in use. In Mysore, he writes, it is admitted that some people resort to it when ill or very near death.\(^{63}\)

Nowadays, it is a fact that some monks or nuns do submit to fasting unto death. In Northern India, such a religious suicide was witnessed by M. and Mme. Louis Renou, in Rajasthan, in the 1940s.\(^{64}\) In Southern India, the existence of this ceremonial is attested.\(^{65}\)

With emotion, Rice, in his publications, evokes the last days of these dying devotees in Sravana Belgola, seated on the burning Candragiri rock, with no shade, under a fiery sun;\(^{66}\) valiant, strong-willed believers, who endeavoured to determine, and control, their lives unto the end.

---

\(^{63}\) IA II, p. 323. Cf., also, by Bühlcr, Über die indische Secte der Jaina, n. 10 p. 36.

\(^{64}\) L. Renou, ‘Une secte religieuse dans l’Inde contemporaine’, Études, 1951, p. 343-351; quoted by J. Filliozat, ‘L’abandon de la vie’, p. 72 n. 3. Cf., also, the cases quoted by Deo, History of Jaina Monachism, p. 420 and n. 217, p. 562 n. 433 (of a Jaina nun in Poona, in 1945; of Lśś Śāntisāgara Mahārāj, a dīgambara, in 1955).

\(^{65}\) Personal Information (Dr. A. N. Upadhye, 1972).

\(^{66}\) IA II, 322.